Even if you're not a musician, when you hear the name "Conrad Veidt", you probably remember him as the man that scared Hitler. However, Veidt was a much more than just the man with the menacing grin that was immortalized in various media. Conrad Veidt was born in Danzig in 1891. He went on to be a successful stage actor and he worked with some great actors, including John Gielgud, who famously declared that Veidt's acting "staginess" was "an improvement on my own". Veidt married his first wife, Emili, in 1913 and the two of them had a son named Gunther, who was born in 1914. After the end of World War I in 1918, Veidt was drafted and sent to the front. After he was discharged, he divorced Emili and married his second wife, Magda, in 1924. In the 1920's, Veidt also began writing. His works included his first play, "Berne Kunst", and he eventually published several novels. Veidt moved to Berlin, Germany in 1925. He was already very familiar with the musical and stage arts of Germany's capital city. In 1927, Veidt's wife died and he then went through a difficult time as a father and husband. He began drinking heavily and he became more and more eccentric as he grew older. In 1930, he was admitted to a mental hospital after he smashed windows and stabbed a police officer. After that, Veidt wasn't the same again and he was eventually convicted of manslaughter in the 1930's. After Germany invaded Poland in 1939, Veidt had to flee Germany with the help of his friend, the Polish actress, Jerzy Grotowski. Together they went to the United Kingdom, where they stayed until Germany invaded France in 1940. Veidt wanted to go to the United 82157476af
